The Stone Wardens

CAMPAIGN PITCH

It has been a century since the War for Union between the Kingdom of Caspernos and the dissenting city states of Tuldot has entered a standstill. Years of peace have brought prosperity to both nations, but worry among civilians grows as tension begins to rekindle between the capitals. The gods of Caspernos warn the people of a dark future.

In a state of worry, groups of believers pray for the fulfillment of the prophecy of the Stone Wardens—a promise that Caspernos' elite guard will return to protect the nation during a time of turmoil. Rumors that the Wardens have awoken in the South begin to spread. But signs of conflict have proven to be restless and growing rapidly.

PROLOGUE

You seem to have awoken from a deep hibernation. As the sun peeking through the pink morning clouds warms your skin, you move your aching joints, contracting muscles that feel foreign to your limbs. As you look down at your feet—which have been submerged in a foot of earth with weeds firmly rooted at your ankles—a disintegrated metallic helmet slides off your head. An emblem eroded to obscurity is stamped on the rusted piece of armor.

You gaze out to the horizon. You see a village and a dense oak forest. A calm river with a raft boasting a beige sail. All of it is unfamiliar. In fact, aside from a few glimpses of scenery, voices, and faces, you remember nothing about who you are. What feels like your most recent memory was nothing but the unbearable heat of a flame and the numbing freezing of your body.

A dread and fear mustered by confusion arises within you. But before the shock drives you into an uncontrolled rush, you notice something in the distance: a small movement, a figure you initially thought was a branchless treetrunk begins to move. A rusted metal helmet clinging to their head reflects the sunlight.

 HERE BEGINS THE STONE WARDENS ***